However, differing estimates of the situation were made by industry officials in New York and by spokesmen for stores and wholesalers in other parts of the country contacted in a spot survey by the Associated Press.

Officials of some large groups of stores here and of one nationwide chain foresaw some price reductions, though not drastic, on canned and other staple foods processed during the high prices of the scare buying wave of last fall and winter. They said that while the situation was not true throughout the industry, a number of wholesalers and retailers had much larger inventories than a year ago at prices higher than what it would cost to replace them now.

Sales Run Higher

But spokesmen in other parts of the country for smaller groups of stores and state associations reported mostly that food sales were running ahead of or equal to last year, with no excess inventories and no price cuts. The first World War changed a lot of things, including bathing suits. These are some California damsels in the advanced styles of 1920. Stripes were the thing, and you can see a definite trend away from the form-hiding fashions of earlier years. But there are still some left-overs of the pantaloonand-long-sleeve era. They all wear some stockings, either long or rolled down below the knee. And the bathing suits are all skirted (although briefly) with trunks underneath. The low sandal had just about replaced the high, laced bathing shoe, but the girl at the right hadn't heard that story yet. Not all of the 1920 beauties went in for the form-fitting suits, however. Here is Margaret Gorman, Miss America of 1921. Her outfit is as form-fitting as a tent. But her dainty dimpled knee is peeking.
